

Reading, Writing, and Language Development Grant Writing Seminar Series for New and Early Stage Investigators

DESCRIPTION: The National Center for Education Research (NCER) and the National Center for Special Education Research (NCSER), Institute of Education Sciences (Institute), U.S.

Department of Education invite new and early stage investigators to attend the Reading, Writing, and Language Development Grant Writing Seminar Series for New and Early Stage Investigators. The objective of the 4-session webinar series is to help new and early stage investigators interested in topics related to reading and writing prepare successful grant applications for the Institute's Education Research Grants program (NCER, 84.305A) or Special Education Research Grants program (NCSER, 84.324A). The programs are the Institute's primary grant programs aimed at supporting research on improving literacy outcomes for students, including English learners and those with disabilities or who are at risk for disabilities or academic failure.

During the seminar series, Institute program officers will provide specific advice on writing successful applications to the Education Research Grants and Special Education Research Grants programs on topics related to reading, writing, and language development. Seminar topics include developing theories of change, effectively describing research to a broad audience, and writing a strong Research Narrative (the substantive core of your application). The sessions will also offer techniques that can be applied to all application writing, including how to organize content and providing continuity throughout the application. In addition, participants will have the opportunity to draft materials to be used in their applications to the Institute and receive comments on them from Institute staff. The sessions are being held in time for applicants to use the information provided and materials developed in their applications to the Education Research Grant and Special Education Research Grant programs, which are due August 23, 2018.

FORMAT: The Reading, Writing, and Language Development Grant Writing Seminar Series for New and Early Stage Investigators will be held as a webinar series with four sessions on Wednesdays from 1:00 – 2:30 pm ET (July 5, 12, 19, and 26). The seminar series is designed to be interactive. Participants are encouraged to participate in discussions during the webinars and will have the opportunity to develop materials that can be used as part of their Institute grant application (e.g., research timeline, purpose statement, structured abstracts).

PARTICIPANTS: The Reading, Writing, and Language Development Grant Writing Seminar Series for New and Early Stage Investigators is open to postdoctoral fellows or new and early stage investigators who have not served as a principal investigator or a co-principal investigator on an Institute grant, and who are interested in submitting an application to the Institute for the Education Research Competition 84.305A or the Special Education Research Competition 84.324A. (See <http://ies.ed.gov/funding> for information on funding opportunities).
